A BIT OF PLEASANTRY

[Original.]

It was in the days of the Borgias, when there were two methods common for getting rid of an enemy, one to stab him in the back, the other to poison him.

Anton Cardl was infatuated with Vittoria Careno, but she being a married woman he had concluded to wed Lucia Sanchez, whom he did not love, but who possessed a fortune. No sooner had the wedding taken place than Signor Careno fell ill and died, leaving Vittoria a widow. Then Cardl was beside himself with anguish that he had not waited. His wife had some inkling of the cause of a distress he could not conceal, and since she loved him she, too, was miserable. One day she met Vittoria and turned her back upon her. "Why do you treat me in this way?" asked Vittoria.

"Because you hold my husband in thrall."

"He holds himself in thrall," replied Signora Careno. "I care no more for him than that," and she snapped her fingers.

Lucia was encouraged at this, thinking that if Anton's love was not returned it would at last wear itself out. She told her husband what Vittoria had said, but it had no effect upon him, he believing that it was a natural denial for Vittoria to make to his own wife. Indeed, when Vittoria, to prove what she had said, made a friend of Lucia, Anton was infatuated enough to suppose that Vittoria was desecrating his wife with a view to gaining opportunities to be near him. Supposing that the woman he loved would marry him if he were free to marry, he resolved to get rid of his wife by poison.

Lucia was used to taking every morning at 11 o'clock a light breakfast or luncheon, as we would call it in America, consisting of a few fancy biscuits and a glass of wine. A servant usually set it out on a table some time during the morning for her mistress to take at the usual hour. One morning Anton passed through the room where the luncheon stood ready. It was 10 o'clock, and his wife would not partake of it for an hour. Nevertheless he resolved to avail himself of the opportunity to drop poison in the wine. He would remain near and see that no one except she for whom it was intended drank it.

While he was waiting, a summons came to him from the grand duke, with whom he stood in high favor, to come at once to the palace. There was nothing to do but to obey. Should he leave the glass of poisoned wine or empty it where it would do no harm? There was no one in the house, for his wife had gone out. She would return before 11, drink the wine, and the culprit, being away at the time, would not be suspected of foul play. He resolved to leave it where it stood.

He had scarcely left the house when he met Vittoria.

"Good morning, Signor Carpi," she said. "I am going to call upon your wife. Is she at home?"

"No," replied Anton; "she is out. You had better choose another time."

"I will go in and wait for her. She has told me that she is never out long in the morning." And she proceeded on her way.

"I must go back," said Anton to the duke's messenger, a young noble of powerful frame and of a merry, devil may care disposition.

"What! To keep company with a lady when your sovereign commands your presence?"

"It is very important that I return to my house at once."

"And I say it is important that you obey the duke's summons."

Anton started to go back, but the messenger caught him about the waist, and as he was of light weight carried him on, laughing at his struggles, considering it a fine thing to be keeping him from a meeting with a lady. The fear that Vittoria might drink the poisoned wine gave Anton strength to resist, but with all this to stimulate him he was unable to break away from his tormentor, who carried him into the presence of the duke, whom he told with great merriment how he had kept him from an appointment.

"Ha, ha, Signor Carpi!" laughed the duke. "We must make an example of a married man who desires to be late with a lady in his own house during his wife's absence. Lock the doors. Come, I have sent for you to play a game of cards. What shall be the stake?"

For an hour the duke kept Anton at the game. Anton was so preoccupied that he scarcely knew one card from another. Finally he showed his suffering so plainly that the duke gave up an amusement that was becoming painful and let his prisoner go, though he jokingly warned him in future to be less open in his appointments.

At 12 o'clock Anton rushed into his house wondering whether he would find Vittoria or his wife dead. He found them both lamenting over the body of his favorite bound. The moment he saw that Vittoria was safe he sank senseless into a chair.

Lucia had come in and found Vittoria waiting for her. Presently Lucia went into the room where luncheon had been set out to find the dog dying and the wineglass empty. She called her friend and they both suspected the wine had been poisoned. When Anton came in excited and fell in a swoon both knew that he had attempted to kill his wife.

Lucia banished her husband from her fortress. Vittoria reported the matter to the duke, who permitted Anton to leave Italy. He lived but a short time, being killed in a duel. Lucia took for her second husband the young noble who had been instrumental in laying bare Anton Carpi's intention.
